Synonyms (noun): brain, consciousness, disposition, instinct, intellect, intelligence, reason, sense, soul, spirit, thought, understanding. Mind includes all the powers of sentient being apart from the physical factors in bodily faculties and activities; in a limited sense, mind is nearly synonymous with intellect, but includes disposition, or the tendency toward action, as appears in the phrase "to have a mind to work." The intellect is that assemblage of faculties which is concerned with knowledge, as distinguished from emotion and volition. Understanding is chiefly used of the reasoning powers: the understanding is distinguished by many philosophers from reason in that reason is the faculty of the high cognitions or a priori truth. Thought, the act, process, or power of thinking, is often used to denote the thinking faculty, and especially the reason. The instinct of animals is held to be of the same nature as the intellect of man, but inferior and limited; yet the apparent difference is very great. Human instincts denote tendencies independent of reasoning or instruction. As the seat of mental activity, brain is often used as a synonym for mind, intellect, intelligence. Sense is used as denoting clear mental action, good judgment, acumen; as, he is a man of sense, or, he showed good sense. Consciousness includes all that a sentient being perceives, knows, thinks, or feels, from whatever source. N

N, n [ENS, N's, Ns pl.] 1 The 14th letter of the English alphabet, from Phenician nun, Greek nu, Roman N. 2 The sound of the letter n, the voiced nasal dental, made by placing the tip of the tongue against the ridge behind the upper front teeth and sending the voiced breath through the nose. N is commonly pronounced as in no, nine, coin, manner, lend, etc. Final n is silent after m, as in condemn, column, damn, hymn, limn, although pronounced when introducing a new syllable, as in condemnation, damnation, solemnize, etc. Syllabic n, comprising a syllable in itself, is heard in cotton, given, kitten, often, Satan, etc.

The digraph ng represents a simple nasal sound made by closing the throat by pressing the back of the tongue against the soft palate and allowing the voiced breath to pass through the nose. It is pronounced as in bang, belong, throng, sung, winging. N before either g or k, or hard c, is pronounced as ng, especially when included in the same syllable or occurring in an accented syllable, as in bank, ink, monkey, uncle, anchor, anger, ingot, lingual, etc. If the g or k introduces a new syllable, however, the n sometimes retains its usual sound, as in congeal, engender, engine, longitude, etc. But usage varies: congressional, for instance, is heard both as con·gressional and cong·gressional, penguin as pen·guin and peng·guin. See ALPHABET, TYPOGRAPHY.

name tabu The prohibition against speaking the name of a god, demon, dead man, or certain persons living or dead, or of revealing one's own name, rooted in the primitive but worldwide belief that one's name is oneself, that it is dangerous for anyone to know it, and to reveal it puts one in the power of another. In the ancient Egyptian, Babylonian, and Hindu religions, just naming the gods compelled them to grant a prayer. In the Old Testament, the name of Yahweh was never uttered except under special conditions. To utter the name of a dead man was to invoke (call for) him: a belief surviving in the modern practice of speaking of "the deceased." The name-tabu motif is prominent in the folk tales of all European countries (the English Tom-Tit-Tot, German Rumpelstiltskin, and Russian Dancing Jargaluska among the most famous) and among all primitive peoples of Africa, North and South America, Malaya, India, etc.

O

O, O [OES, O's, Os pl.] 1 The 15th letter of the English alphabet: from Phenician ayin, which was a consonant, through Greek omicron and omega, and Roman O. 2 The sound of the letter O. In English it is variously pronounced: long, as in bone, go, ode, poet, rode; short, as in bottle; got, not, promise; intermediate, as in born, cord, horse, north, pork; open, as in dog, gone, long, soft; obscure, as in cannon, connect, communicate, lemon, matron, etc. The o in son, some, glove is pronounced like the short u in sun, sum, glut, and occurs frequently in words like come, done, love, money, plover, won, etc. The o pronounced like u in urn is heard in words like word, work, worm, world, worse, worship, worth, etc. (almost always between w and r).

Double o, oo, has two regular pronunciations: long, as in boot, fool, loon, toot (this sound is lowered somewhat before r as in moor, poor); short, as in book, foot, good, wool. It has the value of long o, however, in door, floor, and the value of short u in blood, flood. The o in do, move, to, two, etc., is pronounced like long oo; the o in wolf, woman, etc., like the short oo in wood.

The digraph oa usually has the sound of long o, as in boat, coal, loan, soap, and properly before r, as in oat, board, hoarse; it has the sound of aw in broad, and many speakers give it this sound before r, thus making or and oar, horse and hoarse homophonic. The digraph oe is also normally sounded as long o, as in toe, foe, sloe, but becomes long oo in shoe, canoe.

The diphthong ou is pronounced as in out, flour, loud, ground. This sound is also sometimes spelled ow, as in cowl, growl, owl; when final it is always spelled ow as in allow, cow, now, plow. Often, however, ow has the sound of long o, as in blow, bowl, grow, mown, narrow, own, throw.

Ou is also often heard as long o in soul, dough; as open o in cough; also long oo in group, soup; as short oo in could, should; as short u in rough, trouble; and as the u in urn in courtesy, journal, etc.

The object of desire sometimes follows in an interjectional or elliptical phrase, with for if a substantive, or that if a clause. 3 Same as OH. English nouns regularly form their plurals by adding s or es to the singular; most nouns ending in f change the f to v and add es; as wolf, wolves; half, halves Nouns ending in y change it to ies if it is preceded by a consonant; as, body, bodies; or merely add an s if it is preceded by a vowel; as donkey, donkeys. Some nouns of Anglo-Saxon origin have an irregular plural in en, as child, children; ox, oxen; or by a vowel change; as, mouse, mice; goose, geese; man, men; tooth, teeth. A few nouns retain the singular form unchanged in the plural; as, deer, hose, moose, series, sheep, species, vermin. Some such nouns, especially the names of animals, have also an alternative plural regularly formed; as, fish, fish or fishes. Fish is the usual collective plural; fishes is used to indicate more than one genus, variety, species, etc. Many words of foreign derivation retain the plural form peculiar to the languages from which they are severally derived; as, addendum, addenda; antithesis, antitheses; crisis, crises; datum, data, etc. Many nouns of this class have also a plural of the regular English form; as, appendix, appendixes or appendices; beau, beaus or beaux; cherub, cherubs or cherubim; focus, focuses or foci; index, indexes or indices, etc. Compounds commonly form the plural regularly by adding s or es to the complete word; as, armful, armfuls; cut-throat, cut-throats; football, footballs. The first element of a compound composed of two nouns, even if it should refer to a whole class of things, is never pluralized. We say bookkeepers, hairbrushes, not bookskeeper or hairsbrush. If the last element of the compound forms its plural irregularly, the same form usually appears in the plural of the compound; as, footman, footmen. Nouns that end in –man, but are not compounds, form the plural regularly by adding s, as Mussulman, Mussulmans. But compounds in which the principal word forms the first element change that element to form the plural; as, father-in-law, fathers-in-law; son-in-law, sons-in-law.

PO·LAR·I·ZA′·TION noun 1 The act of polarizing, or state of being polarized; bestowal or gaining of polarity. 2 A condition of radiant energy, most noticeable in light, in which its vibrations assume a definite form when subjected to special influences; also, the act or process of so affecting radiant energy. Light may be polarized by reflection, at an angle which differs for different substances, or by transmission, as through most crystals or solutions. If light thus treated be examined by subjecting it to such reflection or transmission a second time, it is found that in certain positions of the reflector or crystal it will pass most easily, while in the positions at right angles to these it will be totally quenched, and in intermediate positions it will pass partially. The plane of polarization is altered or rotated by the passage of light through suitable media; this is called ROTARY POLARIZATION, which takes two directions, right-handed and left-handed. After reflection from a metal, light exhibits phenomena which make it probable that its vibrations are in closed curves rather than straight lines. Its polarization is then said to be CIRCULAR or ELLIPTIC, as the case may be. 3 A change in the potential of the electrode of a cell due to the accumulation upon it of dissociation products liberated by the current. — ANGLE OF POLARIZATION or POLARIZING ANGLE That angle of reflection from a plane surface at which light is polarized. — PLANE OF POLARIZATION The plane in which the light vibrations occur when polarized.

Synonyms: anticipate, forestall. The original sense of prevent, to go or come before, act in advance of, now practically obsolete, was still in good use when the authorized version of the Bible was made, as appears in such passages as "Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness" (that is, by sending the blessings before the desire is formulated or expressed), Ps. xxi, 3. Anticipate is now the only single word usable in this sense; to forestall is to take or act in advance in one's own behalf and to the prejudice or hindrance of another. But to anticipate is very frequently used in the favorable sense; as, his thoughtful kindness anticipated my wish (that is, met the wish before it was expressed); or one anticipates a payment (by making it before the time). Synonyms: antecedent, anterior, earlier, foregoing, former, precedent, preceding, preliminary, prior. Antecedent may denote simple priority in time, implying no direct connection between that which goes before and that which follows; as, the striking of one clock may be always antecedent to the striking of another with no causal connection between them. Antecedent and previous may refer to that which goes or happens at any distance in advance, preceding is limited to that which is immediately or next before, an antecedent event may have happened at any time before, the preceding transaction is the one completed just before the one with which it is compared; a previous statement or chapter may be in any part of the book that has gone before; the preceding statement or chapter comes next before without an interval. Foregoing is used only of that which is spoken or written; as, the foregoing statements. Anterior, while it can be used of time, is coming to be employed chiefly with reference to place, as, the anterior lobes of the brain. Prior bears exclusive reference to time, and commonly where that which is first in time is first also in right; as, a prior demand. Former is used of time, or of position in written or printed matter, not of space in general. We say former times, a former chapter, etc. Former has a close relation, or sharp contrast, with something following; the former always implies the latter, even when not fully expressed.
